Criminals on probation are monitored with a phone call

Richard Ford Home Correspondent

Thousands of criminals are being supervised with just a brief telephone call, the chief inspector of probation said yesterday, and echoed calls for a proper assessment and monitoring of the probation service. The House of Commons Science and Technology Committee said that it was necessary to “pre-empt the worst” of judicial decisions that were “indefensible”. But the Home Office said that it was necessary to “punish the worst” of the most serious criminals.

Matthew Moore Media Correspondent

Controversial legislation that would have made it harder for journalists to expose wrongdoing and criminals and corrupt politicians was rebuffed last night, after senior peers spoke up in defence of press freedom.

Analysis

A society, we have become much more comfortable speaking about mental illness. Depression is no longer the stigmatising label it once was, so one would expect doctors to be seeing more mental illnesses, even if it has not changed (Chris Smythe writes). It is possible that wider acceptance of mental health problems means that we are more likely to own up to negative feelings. But the findings of the Health Survey for England are similar to a study last year, suggesting that there is something real going on. Social media, millennial culture and social media giants now fueling mental health problems in children.

Peers reject attack on press freedom

Matthew Moore Media Correspondent

Lord Justice Leveson’s report of the chief inspector of probation said that it was necessary to “pre-empt the worst” of judicial decisions that were “indefensible”. But the Home Office said that it was necessary to “punish the worst” of the most serious criminals.

Analysis

A society, we have become much more comfortable speaking about mental illness. Depression is no longer the stigmatising label it once was, so one would expect doctors to be seeing more mental illnesses, even if it has not changed (Chris Smythe writes). It is possible that wider acceptance of mental health problems means that we are more likely to own up to negative feelings. But the findings of the Health Survey for England are similar to a study last year, suggesting that there is something real going on. Social media, millennial culture and social media giants now fueling mental health problems in children.

Peers reject attack on press freedom

Matthew Moore Media Correspondent

Lord Justice Leveson’s report of the chief inspector of probation said that it was necessary to “pre-empt the worst” of judicial decisions that were “indefensible”. But the Home Office said that it was necessary to “punish the worst” of the most serious criminals.

Analysis

A society, we have become much more comfortable speaking about mental illness. Depression is no longer the stigmatising label it once was, so one would expect doctors to be seeing more mental illnesses, even if it has not changed (Chris Smythe writes). It is possible that wider acceptance of mental health problems means that we are more likely to own up to negative feelings. But the findings of the Health Survey for England are similar to a study last year, suggesting that there is something real going on. Social media, millennial culture and social media giants now fueling mental health problems in children.